Vitamins Alone Are Not Enough

As the demand for dietary supplementation grew, vitamins and minerals were pharmaceutically isolated and manufactured into pills without food. Unfortunately, scientists noticed that the biological activity of these isolated nutrients were notably lower than the activity of the same nutrients combined with other compounds contained in food. To compensate for the lost biological activity of synthetic vitamins and minerals, higher doses were recommended. For decades people assumed if they took a "complete" multivitamin, they would be getting all the nutrients they needed for good health. New research has shown that high dosages of vitamins and minerals cannot replace the health benefits of the missing food compounds. As scientists discovered the powerful health-promoting activities of food compounds in the body and their interaction with other nutrients, it became clear that vitamins and minerals alone are not enough for optimal health. Food compounds are the key to complete nutrition and wellness.
